Architecture takes shape through a constant interplay between intention and reality, between those who propose and the place that receives. Every project is a dialogue, an encounter between ideas, experiences and a context, from which something unexpected always emerges.
The round trip evokes this reciprocity: giving and receiving, sharing and learning, intervening and allowing ourselves to be transformed. It runs through our trajectories, our practices and the way we approach design.
Through our experiences and our collaborative work with students, we seek to explore this relationship between architecture and place as an open process of exchange and discovery, where knowledge flows both ways and each encounter enriches the next.
